

Introduction of sample proposal in the subject of Telepathy

There are various theories about telepathy, some studies substantially deny the existence of such a subject, and others try to prove it. Some see it as a mental ability that cannot be investigated in the context of research. In fact, these people say that although such a capability exists, it is a mental ability specific to certain individuals and cannot be measured.

The existence of a telepathic relationship is considered important in psychological research because if such a relationship is established, it can mean that emotions and thoughts can be transmitted through telepathy. On the other hand, in the field of psychology the subject of emotion change has always been of great importance, and if it is proven that telepathy can do so, then psychologists will have a powerful tool to produce the necessary effects on the thoughts and feelings of their clients. In previous studies, the topic of telepathy has been explored in terms of concept transfer, and some studies support it. It has, however, been criticized in some respects. For example, in opposition to the studies which support the idea of conveying concepts through telepathy, critics believe that such studies do not meet the criteria of scientific research.

One aspect of telepathy which has received less attention is the transmission of emotions through telepathy. In fact, various studies have focused solely on the transmission of concepts through telepathy and have not focused on the transmission of emotions.

The ultimate goal of this study is to examine the methods used in the process of feeling transmission via telepathy. Therefore, this research is not intended to prove the existence of the telepathy, but rather by studying various cases, the processes and tools used in feeling transmission through telepathy will be discussed.

Humans have always sought to discover ways to communicate effectively and achieve their true status in the social realm. Thus, if a way is found for individuals to receive each other's feelings without expressing it verbally and directly, without interference, they will obviously act more strongly and more assuredly in social communication.

On the other hand, one of the perennial weaknesses of psychology is that in this science, the psychologist receives information through clients and cannot find it directly and without interference. In other words, the most effective way to obtain information and to get acquainted with the feelings and problems of the clients is the way the clients express themselves. Now, if a way is found for the psychologist to gain direct access to the clients' feelings and thoughts, rather than relying on their descriptions, he can take a more effective step in the diagnosis and treatment of the problem.

Therefore, telepathy, which refers to the transmission of thoughts and feelings without expressing them verbally, can be one of these effective ways.